Debates on Indonesia's Cultural Heritage: a way to access the past

Press reports concerning illicit excavations, stolen artifacts from museums, and new spectacular archaeological discoveries have fostered a new discourse on national heritage of Indonesia. Historical museums facilitate a better understanding of national and local history, whereas questions regarding the restitution of cultural property staying abroad or of maritime national heritage are discussed on a globalized level. Case studies from Java and Sumatra highlight the conflicting interests and the media, aiming to create new national symbols from the past.
